SAY ORGANIC ACT'S SECURE

Macfarland and Truesdell Say Johnson's Attack Will Be Without Avail.

BOTH CITE AUTHORITIES

Truesdell Calls to Witness Blackburn, of Kentucky, Once District Chairman.

With the continued potency of the organic act dependent upon the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, former Commissioner Henry R. F. Macfarland, and Col. George Truesdell, a prominent real estate dealer and close student of the District form of government, yesterday came to the defense of the act. They pointed out that the District faces a crisis under its present form of government. Should it be held that the local government is in the debt of the national government for "loans" to meet the interest on the 2 1/2 bonds, as is claimed by Representative Johnson, chairman of the House District Committee, the National Capital would practically face bankruptcy. It was shown, however, that close application to the laws under which the early appropriations were made, will show that the government is pledged beyond recall to pay one-half of the interest and sinking fund on the bonded indebtedness of the District.

Criticism of Representative Johnson for the fact that his investigation had apparently taken in only one side of the subject was voiced by Johnson.

Mr. Johnson's attack on the appropriation providing for the government's share of the interest and sinking fund on the District debt, it was pointed out, was practically the same as that on the previous occasions. This year it was more elaborate, but had the same basis.

Shortly after his first attack on the organic act, a report on the financial condition of the District and the records of the time when the organic act was passed and shortly afterward, which entirely contravened the argument of Mr. Johnson, Mr. Johnson apparently did not take the trouble to study this.

Former Commissioner Macfarland said that the District government cannot be compared to any other, for the reason of Washington being the site of the National Capital, it would be impossible.

He showed, for the comparatively few residents of their own accord to maintain the city in any way, leaving the majority of the city. He quoted authorities to defend the half-and-half plan, showing that so far as human language could give expression the financial condition of the District, the Federal government was in share with the District government the interest on the District debt, and that later it was decided to share in the sinking fund.

Planned for Nation.

"This is the National Capital. This fact, so familiar, yet sometimes so ignored, is obscured in the foundation of the city. Mr. Macfarland said it is not exclusively the city of those who live here, George Washington planned it as the national city and planned it had not until the time it was laid out.

He maintained in large part by the nation from the beginning. Certainly the comparatively few people here could not develop or maintain it on its own. It is the plan of an early settlement suitable to the wealth, power and dignity of the nation. Hence and self-sacrificing effort on the part of the people here during the first century of comparative municipal neglect by the national government almost bankrupted the taxpayers as repeatedly the Congressional reports stated. Then Congress, not the taxpayers, directed the Shenandoah improvements which began the redemption of the shabby city and its conversion into a real National Capital.

As the official government report shows, the taxpayers had then spent twice as much as the national government. The national government was in arrears not to the taxpayers but to the National Capital from the time it started in on land given by the original proprietors, and money loaned by Virginia and Maryland because of its poverty.

"All intelligent Americans want their National Capital to be the best on earth, not simply physically, but in all the features of the modern city: in education and health, protection given as much as in parks and streets. They would be ashamed, for example, to have competent critics at home or abroad hold its death rate to be the condemnation of the world. They make no division between what are called national features and what are called local features, but regard it as an integral whole, like any other city.

"Moreover, as I can testify from abundant opportunity, such Americans in all sections of the country approve heartily all taxes that are levied on the principal cities of the country. I presented in Congress have done for their Capital and wish they would do more."

Easy for District.

"When the time comes, if it does, to argue this question before the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Attorney General of the United States or in the courts, the case of the National Capital, including the District taxpayers, will be easy to present, for it is founded on a rock, and back of it is the desire of the patriotic people of the country.

"For ten years I may be pardoned a personal allusion. I considered it an important part of my official duty to explain the relations between the nation and its Capital to the representative men and women who met here in national gatherings from every Congressional district of the country. In that time at least one hundred thousand such visitors have outlined at least of the argument for the National Capital. Moreover, as the same duty before boards of trade, bankers' associations, and other representative bodies in a score of the principal cities of the country. I presented the same arguments. We have convincing proof in the actions of Congress during that decade that the effort was not in vain.

"More important than any particular plan for the development of the National Capital is the financial arrangement which makes all its development possible, and this should be constantly explained to the people who wish their Capital to be perfect, and constantly advocated before Congress."

Col. Truesdell quoted the same authorities as Mr. Macfarland, in addition calling attention to a controversy on the floor of the House in 1873, in which the chairman of the District Committee, Mr. Blackburn, of Kentucky, opposed an ap-

DAWE RECOMMENDS BUDGET ESTIMATE

Editor of Chamber of Commerce Addresses Members of Y. M. C. A. Educational Department.

The present haphazard method followed by Congress in making appropriations is "leading to the error in the public mind that regards a Congressman as if he were the special attorney to get as much as he could for his district, and to the scramble for appropriations between department heads. This session was made last night by G. Granger Dawe, editor of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, in an address on "The National Budget," delivered before the educational department of the Washington Y. M. C. A.

Mr. Dawe advocated a budget estimate in which the President and Cabinet will advise Congress each year what work ought to be undertaken, the estimated cost of doing it, and the manner in which funds may be provided for financing the proposed expenditures. If any additional work and expenditures are desired by Congress, Mr. Dawe added, those should not be included in the budget appropriations, but shall stand by themselves as separate measures, for which individual Congressmen or the entire Congress are willing to be held responsible.

Mr. Dawe's lecture formed the sixth in a free public series of lectures delivered on Friday nights, dealing with present day problems facing the nation's business men.

SEPARATE OBSERVATORY.

Scientist Want It Taken from Navy Department.

From many of the scientists of the country are coming letters urging the proposed change of the Naval Observatory from the hands of the Navy Department into those of a separate department made up of scientific men whose life-work has been a study of the heavens.

The advantage of this change is to be investigated by a subcommittee appointed yesterday by Senator Perkins, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Many witnesses from the Navy Department and from various scientific bodies are to appear before the subcommittee in the near future to tell the members what they think of the scheme. The fact that the Geological Survey and the Weather Bureau were taken from military and given over to civilian control is pointed to as a precedent for such a change.

GENERAL CLEANING UP.

Hitchcock Orders R. E. D. Equipment Put in Good Condition.

With a view of having the equipment present an appearance creditable to the postal service, Postmaster General Hitchcock has ordered a general inspection of the transportation used in the delivery and collection of all mail offices. Vehicles found at all dilapidated or unsightly are to be repaired or replaced. This applies to horse-drawn vehicles and automobiles furnished by carriers and contractors.

It will be the duty of the postmasters to see that the horses are prompt in action, creditable in appearance, in first-class condition, and suitable for the work required of them. The harness, whips, and other accessories must be kept in good condition. Wagons and automobiles shall be kept in neat repair, painted and varnished in a thorough manner, clean and in good condition, and neatly lettered on each side, "U. S. Mail." When painting is necessary, vermilion red will be used, with appropriate trimmings.
